Tech gains help fuel new highs

Wall Street capped another week of gains with more milestones Friday, as strength in technology and health care stocks helped push the S&P 500 and Dow Jones Industrial Average to all-time highs. The S&P 500 rose 0.8 percent for its fourth record high this week and third straight weekly gain. Stocks have benefited this week as bond yields, which had been steadily ticking higher, retreated from highs hit earlier in the month. Higher yields can slow down the economy by pushing up interest rates, making it more expensive for people and businesses to borrow money. Bond yields rose Friday, but that didn't weigh on stocks. "The S&P 500 finished at another all-time high today as investors have become comfortable enough with the current level of interest rates and inflation to keep putting money into equities," said Chris Zaccarelli, chief investment officer for Independent Advisor Alliance. Most analysts expect inflation to increase as the economy improves. "We're seeing some evidence of inflation creeping into the market place, but it's not problematic," said Terry Sandven, chief equity strategist at US Bank Wealth Management. ASSOCIATED PRESS

Boeing's 737 Max faces new setback

Airlines notified of a potential electrical issue

By Niraj Chokshi
NEW YORK TIMES

Just months after returning to the skies, Boeing's troubled 737 Max jet is facing another setback.

Boeing said Friday that it had notified 16 airlines and other customers of a potential electrical problem with the Max and recommended that they temporarily stop flying some planes. The company refused to say how many planes were affected, but four US airlines said they would stop using nearly 70 Max jets. Boeing would not say how long the planes would be sidelined.

Airlines and Boeing have tried hard in the last several months to convince passengers that the Max is safe. This latest problem is sure to spur further doubt among some travelers about the plane.

"It's a Max, so everybody is interested and that makes perfect sense, but this is the aviation maintenance system working the way that it should," said John Cox, a former airline pilot and crash investigator and chief executive of Safety Operating Systems, an aviation consulting firm.

Boeing said that the affected airlines should verify that a component of the electrical power system on certain Max planes is sufficiently fastened. The statement comes just months after companies resumed flying the jet, which had been grounded for nearly two years because of a pair of accidents that killed nearly 350 people.

"We are working closely with the US Federal Aviation Administration on this production issue," Boeing said in a statement. "We are also informing our customers of specific tail numbers affected and we will provide direction on appropriate corrective actions."

The FAA said that Boeing notified it late Thursday of the problem, which could affect the operation of a backup power control unit. The agency said it was working with the company and its customers. "It is premature to estimate the amount of time required as it could take a matter of hours or a few days," Boeing said.

The Max was banned from flying globally in March 2019 because of the crashes, in Indonesia and Ethiopia. After a lengthy review, the FAA allowed the Max to fly again in November, provided that Boeing and airlines made changes to the jet, including updating its flight control software and rerouting some electrical wiring. Boeing and the FAA said the potential electrical issue flagged this week was unrelated to that earlier directive.

Since the FAA review, aviation regulators around the world have also approved the plane. As of late March, 17 Boeing customers had returned the plane to service, using it for nearly 14,000 flights.

American Airlines, Southwest Airlines, and United Airlines, the top three operators of the Max, said on Friday that they had removed 63 planes from service. And Alaska Airlines said it had removed all four of its Max jets.

Southwest Airlines, which operates an all-Boeing fleet and is one of the biggest users of the Max, said in a statement that it had not experienced any "known operational challenges" related to the issue Boeing flagged. Thirty of its 58 Max jets were affected by the notification and the airline said it had only 15 or fewer Max jets scheduled to fly each day, which were being swapped out for other planes in its 737 fleet.

United said that 16 of its 30 Max planes were affected by Boeing's announcement and that they would not be used to carry passengers. American Airlines said that the issue affected 17 of its most recently delivered planes, all of which have been temporarily sidelined.
